"Either the dictator [Maduro] must be removed, or the people must overthrow him," those who take a side in this conflict are saying. The government of Maduro, it is said, is "illegitimate". It seems to me that the circumstances surrounding the election of Nicolas Maduro, who replaced Hugo Chavez, are so mystifying that the answer to the question of "who won" the election is "it is not clear". Yes, this is known, and no serious person, without a very narrow orientation, tries to dispute it. Many of us understood that Maduro's victory would be a tactical mistake. However, it now seems that the US – and the UK – have no intention of returning to the negotiation table. The refusal of the United States to accept the vote of the Venezuelan people is, above all, based on the assumption that it has the right to impose its view of an ethical, social, and economic order on an entire country. As a result, there is no refusal to the idea that Washington makes money with public support by "representing" the interests of the imperial powers. And it has no scruples about threatening this money flow, and the financial power that it represents, through the immediate economic blockade. However, there is only one sure way out of the deadlock 595f342e71
