The game's small team of motion capture engineers have pioneered "real-time player animation" and now make the second player in a live match look and move exactly like the first. The hyper-realistic player models from FIFA 19 have been enhanced with more detailed animations, greater numbers of movements and contextual performance tools, including the latest innovations in ball physics, physical players, player controller changes, and animation control for more responsive gameplay. The new game engine - codenamed "FANatic" - is built on FIFA 19's gameplay innovations and has been completely reworked. It moves beyond the limitations of previous FIFA game engines by incorporating new physics to make goalkeepers and goalpost ropes behave more realistically, along with new, upgraded ball physics, new full-body tackling systems, a new weather system, new player morph animations, improved AI ball skills and new ball tracking systems. FANatic also delivers a vastly improved overall experience, fixing issues players have been complaining about for years - such as micro stutters, stuttering animations, lag, freezing AI players, and single-player issues - and several bugs found through post-launch testing are also now fixed. "FIFA has always been a game of the players," said MLS director of product Tim Bezbatchenko. "In FIFA 20, we committed to adding true-to-life player models and animations. The results of that research were stunning. With FIFA 21, we wanted to match those achievements by going one step further. We've enabled players to experience the world's most authentic football simulation with an updated game engine and more realistic player models." "Thanks to the dedication of the FIFA community, we've heard your feedback and it's been a key part of our mission to make FIFA the best football game ever," said Geraint Davies, executive vice president and chief product officer, EA Sports. "We're immensely excited to be able to introduce our community to the next step in the journey towards making the game more lifelike." FIFA 21 will be available September 27. Rearrange the dynamics of football's most important moments on the pitch through five gameplay mechanics, five components of an ultra-realistic experience, and 14 tools that develop gameplay like never before.
