What's new in version 1.03: Minor bug fixes. Android-first camera app taken to the limit 0 A small startup, which has always put the interests of users first, has been working on developing some really great camera apps. PhotoStrip and PhotoFlow are two such apps that have seen a lot of success in this area. We have given their camera apps a review already. Today, they are introducing something different, called 'Strobe' which it says is the first DSLR app that can be used with smartphones. Strobe - 'Your Pic, Strobe' The app has to be downloaded from the Google Play store. Once you get it downloaded, you can get started with it very quickly. It's a simple app that comes in handy if you don't want to get the camera, yourself. It lets you take photos in a set scene, like beach, party etc. It also has a 5-sensor measurement system built-in that allows you to measure light quality at different times of the day. The app doesn't require any setup, it just works itself. What it does, is that it takes a photo every five seconds and it blends all the photos together in one. It can also show the average exposure in red to help you get a more accurate exposure. Strobe's camera app has been released for Android devices. The company has also launched an iPhone app as well. 'Strobe' is a perfect example of how you can improve photography through the cloud. with a degazy-sequencer (see below). \param All
