upon the ability of the practitioner to deliver such internal elements to the location inside a patient where they are needed. Delivery of internal elements directly into the region of a disease process is, however, difficult or impossible in many cases. Oftentimes the internal element must first be suspended or emplaced within a body cavity and then directed in a pre-determined course to reach the site of the disease process. Depending on the nature of the internal element, such as a drug, or the nature of the disease, such as a type of cancer, this can require the use of catheters, which can be difficult to place. For instance, the delivery catheters used in delivering stents or other devices for the relief of ischemia in coronary arteries, have many limitations when used for the delivery of internal elements. For example, a typical Coronary Stent Delivery System for the treatment of ischemic heart disease includes an elongate catheter having a balloon on its distal end, a stent in a cylindrical collapsed shape disposed inside the balloon, and a sheath which surrounds the catheter and the stent. In the distal end of the catheter is a lumen which extends through the interior of the catheter and through the stent. After the stent is disposed at the desired location in a coronary artery, the stent is expanded to its open configuration, within the vascular system of a patient, by a combination of mechanical forces applied to the catheter and stent, and gas pressure which is applied to the interior of the balloon of the catheter. The catheter is Keygen. The present invention relates generally to the field of computing, and more particularly to security. Computer and communication security, especially for use over the Internet, is a major concern. Recently, mobile computing, often using the Internet, has emerged.

Mobile computing provides access to network services while a user is in transit.
Security for mobile computing may be especially important because a user is likely to take the computing device to a variety of locations such as travel to a hotel, to a parking garage at the airport, etc. In addition, the user is less likely to use computing security procedures when in transit. Hence, a malicious user in transit may obtain the user's secrets, such as the user's bank account information, or other confidential information, from the computing device.
