We previously showed that women and infants are equally protected against infection with human cytomegalovirus (HCMV), which raises the question of whether neonates recognize differently HCMV epitopes. To address this issue, we have determined the frequency of HLA class I-restricted CTLs in different age groups of healthy individuals. Using a single epitope peptide (IE2 264-272)-specific T-cell line (CF3), HLA class I tetramers and ELISPOT, we have shown that a small percentage of HLA-A2+ and A3+ neonates recognize IE2 264-272 (8.6% and 14.9%, respectively). These data were corroborated by the low percentage of peripheral blood mononuclear cells (PBMC) staining positive for HLA-A2 and A3 molecules, which recognize IE2 264-272 in ELISPOT. We also observed that several members of the HLA-B antigens family, which were previously reported not to recognize the IE2 264-272 epitope, were able to present this epitope in ELISPOT, suggesting that the antigen-recognition specificity of the neonatal HLA class I molecules is broader than previously thought. Finally, we demonstrated that HCMV-infected newborn PBMC could induce the proliferation of autologous PBMC at levels comparable with those of adults. These results are consistent with the infection of newborn infants with HCMV.Q: What is the advantage of using a second NFC d0c515b9f4
