When choosing a photo editing tool, make sure that you select one that can handle the file type of your source photos. The source image file formats are JPEG (Portable File Format), TIFF (Tagged Image File Format), or RAW (Digital Camera File Format). The following sections cover the basics of the most common editing techniques. If you've chosen to shoot in RAW format, read the section about RAW image editing in Chapter 6. Before you start editing: Adjusting the display settings Shooting and editing on the computer is quite different from taking photos with a camera. To be able to work with your photos properly, you must use the settings that are appropriate for your monitor's resolution. The screen resolution of your monitor determines the size of a pixel. The general rule is that the smaller the number of pixels, the more sharp and detailed your monitor's display is capable of displaying. Most of the programs that you use to modify images on the computer monitor have a menu that enables you to adjust the display settings. In this menu, you can choose the following settings: Image size: Although the image on your computer monitor is only about one-half as large as the print sizes you are probably used to seeing, it can have a greater display area than a print. The most important settings to set are the screen resolution and the magnification (or image size). If the resolution of the screen is set too low, the image will be pixelated (like a blurry film negative). When enlarging an image, you may see the image look a little blocky if the resolution is set too low. To overcome this problem, it may be necessary to increase the image size on the monitor, such as by using the previous settings. Color mode: Most graphics programs enable you to adjust the color mode. Although this setting doesn't change the color of your image directly, it may make it easier to see your image in terms of its overall color. If you're concerned about the look of your image, you can save a copy of the image in a color mode that's closest to your desired appearance. For example, the Bright image mode gives the brightest appearance, while the Black and White image mode gives the darkest. Image type: Most programs allow you to change the type of the image from one type to another. If your image was shot in JPEG format, you can choose to convert it to TIFF, which gives you more editing options. You can also save the

What's New In?

Julia Child and My Career (Or, Why I Don't Love Husbands) Marriage (or, I guess, love) is a funny thing — but I only realize this now that I am a married woman. At the time, I was more concerned with having a career. I was a freshman in college, and though I had always known I wanted to be a writer, for most of my adult life I had also thought that I would remain single. I wanted to have a career in literature; I wanted to write and be a good teacher. In 1990, I won a writing fellowship to attend the Iowa Writers' Workshop, and I was ecstatic to go: it was my first year away from home. I was taken aback by the campus, and after a few days I decided to move into the dorms. So I did. In my senior year, I had the opportunity to spend a semester at a posh campus in northern Italy — to study fiction writing and language, to work with other writers in a hotbed of creativity. I chose to go. After that, I went back to finishing my degree, and then I came home to New York City and to teaching. That fall, I got a part-time job at the New York Times, and that was where I worked for 15 years. I started as a reporter and then moved into the education department, becoming an education columnist, and eventually I left for a time to write a book — the memoir about my family and myself that inspired my stage show. When I was 30, I married my husband, who is also a writer and a teacher. I never, ever, ever wanted to be married. I wanted to be a writer, and I wanted to be a good teacher, and I knew that one day I'd be a good writer and a good teacher, but not both. Advertisement Now I have a husband and a house and a baby and a crazy job as a host of a TV show about cooking. I have a good job: I am being supported. I am a successful, single woman. I am a wife and mother. I am married. I am Julia — I am Julia Child. I have always been happy. I have always been a good daughter, a good sister, and a good friend, and I have always been an amateur chef, and now a professional chef. I am a writer
